

One of the Most Terrible Tragedies Ever Enacted in New York—How the Shooting Occurred.

or during the struggle; the policeman came about five minutes after the shot was fired; Chambers surrendered to him peacefully, and was taken to the station house; he told the policeman he had not done anything; a crowd of people then came in; Dr. Ford attended Mr. Voorhees, who was removed to the station; he never spoke after he was shot; the Doctor at once said he could not recover; the ball struck him over the right eyebrow, and lodged in the brain.

Mr. Fechter is not a great actor, and it seems proper that that should be said. His "Hamlet" is like the "Hamlets" of a great many other performers. It has many good points, but lacks genius. What we expect in "Hamlet" is a mental craze. A man who has seen a spirit is never afterwards sane. In the character of "Hamlet" the chief elements are intellectuality, spirituality, overwrought imagination, mournfulness, lassitude, princely pace, sad, quaint humor, and sombre dignity. Of course no man can speak himself to the first, and not to lend herself to the least intrigue against the Government of the Revolution. In it she should make prominent her Spanish patriotism (Españolismo), declaring herself proud to be a Spaniard, and to have been born in the land of whatever the nation accorded in the exercise of its incontestable sovereignty. The Conde de Reus added:—"I do not hold out any hope, in saying this, that I shall be able to do anything for you, but I am giving counsel for your tranquillity of the soul. The need being thus shown, it must be left to time to present the fruit of conduct worthy, liberal, and prudent. I am sure that General Prim will be able to find indications were sufficient to make him, if he would permit me to unroll them as my loyalty understood them, and would concede to me, I would not be a traitor. He replied:—"Yes; you have always been so. But I am not a traitor. I am a Spaniard, and he left for Madrid. Great was the effect caused in the Queen, but it did not last long because of her surroundings. No further advancement was made towards the abdication till the 3d of October.

might be made happy in her last moments. They were accordingly hurried by the bedside, and the sick woman, having her heart's wish gratified, turned over to die, and it was not so long, for she, much to the astonishment of all her family, rapidly grew better, and recovered of her illness, only to find her husband was a confirmed invalid.

There was more than the woman bargained for, the two females fixed up the matter, and it was soon agreed that they would live in harmony in the same house, and thus they lived for some years. Both women raised a family of children; one had six and the other five. Some of these children are grown-up and married, and the two women are still in time.

About 1840, the two women quarrelled and separated, and each went to her own home.

the contents into the pan. An explosion followed, and the glass flew in all directions. Two fingers of his uninjured hand and one of his toes were blown off. A piece of glass struck Mr. Harry Entworth and cut his clothes, but did not injure him. Mr. Fender is very popular with the dramatic profession, who will regret the accident.

Government bonds were dull, and somewhat irregular, though our quotations show a slight advance in some of the list.
